

The Politics of Digital Humanitarianism

New digital technologies promise to resolve many challenges that impede the efforts of humanitarian actors. But technologies have also a political dimension: They can have unintended harmful effects and configure social relations in new ways. In this light, we will explore the politics of humanitarian technology use and ask how digital technologies transform humanitarianism. The Institute for International Law of Peace and Armed Conflict is delighted that two distinguished speakers will provide inputs for the discussion: Delf Rothe presents his research on “Digital humanitarianism and the governance of refugee camps” and Kristin Bergtora Sandvik shares insights on the development “Towards an extractive humanitarianism”.
